

They pulled the Harriet Miers card out of their sleeve

Written by The Admiral

Wednesday, 12 May 2010 17:06 -

I just knew it. I didn't know when, but I knew it was coming. For the record, I was never in favor of or supportive of Harriet Miers nomination by President Bush to the SCOTUS. But it seems some high profile Republicans that still hold office were. They cited her being an outsider without prior judicial experience as a positive, but now that Obama nominated Elena Kagan, all of a sudden judicial experience matters. Let me see if I have this right. It was okay with the Bush nominee, but not the Obama nominee. Why some people would call that hypocritical.

You see, this is why I hate politicians. You either be consistent or get the hell out of D.C. Be true to yourself and don't back down from your principles and beliefs just because your guy does something, or the other guy does something. This is why the majority of America despises congress.

I got the idea for this post from Mike Lillis of the Washington Independent and of all places, Media Matters

. Oddly enough those two sources only cite Republican inconsistencies. What those two sources don't tell you is the very same Democrats are for Elena Kagan for the exact same reasons they opposed Harriet Miers. Hypocrisy again. Are you as fed up with this crap as I am? From both sides. We have the opportunity to stop this crap in November. I suggest we do. It's time for fresh blood in D.C., on both sides.